Bnai Brith A.D.L. Urges U.S. To Stop Arab Cruise Curb

The Anti-Defamation League of Bnai Brith has asked U.S. Secretary of Commerce John Connor to determine whether American President Lines' subsidy should be withdrawn for the round-the-world voyage of the liner President Roosevelt, says Walter Harnshar, marine editor of the New York Herald Tribune, because the company canceled the ship's originally scheduled call at Haifa, Israel, in response to a threat from the Arab League.

Withdrawal of the subsidy would force the line to cancel the entire 60-day global voyage, which is scheduled to begin January 20 from San Francisco with calls at 25 ports, including New York, in the itinerary. A company official said that the voyage has been a sell-out with about 300 booked to make the long, de luxe cruise.

The same company official said the call at Haifa could not be restored to the schedule, because the Arab League had notified the line ... the ship would not be allowed to pass through the Suez Canal if it is scheduled to call at Haifa. Inability to pass through the canal would force the company to cancel the voyage in any event.

Cancellation would disrupt the plans of the 300 passengers and would give the American-flag passenger fleet another black eye, the official said. American passenger ships have been laboring under a cloud in the cruise business because of the many voyages that have had to be canceled in the past on account of labor trouble.

The complaint against the American President Lines was filed in a letter to Mr. Connor from Arnold Forster, general counsel of the anti-discrimination society. The Maritime Administration, which normally would handle such a complaint, said that the case had not yet been referred to it for investigation by Mr. Connor's office, says the New York Herald Tribune. The delay was attributed to the Christmas mails.

In his complaint Mr. Forster said that the cancellation of the call violated a 1965 amendment to the Export Control Act. The amendment says that it is the policy of the U.S. "to encourage and request domestic concerns engaged in export of articles, materials, supplies, or information, to refuse to take any action, including the furnishing of information or the signing of agreements, which has the effect of furthering or supporting the restrictive trade practices or boycotts fostered or imposed by any foreign country against another country friendly to the United States."

Mr. Forster contended that the cancellation of the Haifa call furthered the Arab League's boycott against Israel, which has been in effect since Israel became an independent nation almost 20 years ago.

Mr. Forster's contention was that since the cancellation allegedly violated U. S. policy, this might be a reason to withdraw the subsidy.

The ship line said that it had no alternative to cancelling the Haifa call, for which a call at Piraeus, Greece, was substituted, except to cancel the entire voyage. Meanwhile, it has been making efforts to persuade the Arab League to withdraw its ultimatum and allow the call at Haifa.

The Arab boycott has posed a dilemma to ship lines for years for the usual procedure of ships sailing the Mediterranean is to trade in all ports. Ship lines have avoided a showdown in the past by avoiding calls at Israeli ports for ships transiting the canal.

World cruises have not been affected by the boycott because such ships normally carry little or no cargo, says the New York Herald Tribune. The boycott is aimed at preventing cargo calls at Haifa.

The reason the President Roosevelt is affected in this first of a series of cruises is that the line plans that the ship carry cargo as well as passengers.

Cancellation of the Haifa call is particularly irritating to Israel because the liner President Roosevelt is actually an old friend, in a sense. The liner at one time was the American Export passenger ship La Guardia, named for the late Mayor of New York.

When the La Guardia was reconverted from the troopship Gen. Richardson in 1948 to a passenger ship, she was assigned to the Italy run. But the vessel was never a success in that route.

Countess, Once N.Y. Girl, Robbed Of Jewels; Sang At La Scala; Wed Big Fascist

Countess Attilio Teruzzi, the widow of one of Mussolini's most dashing generals, reported that seven pieces of jewelry valued at $345,000 had been stolen from her apartment in the Mayfair House, 610 Park Avenue, New York, says the New York Herald Tribune. Countess Teruzzi, aged seventy-two years, told police that she had returned to her third-floor apartment from the Imperial Ball at one a.m., slept until 11, and then noticed that a jewelry box and $250 in cash were missing.

Police said that there were no indications of a forced entry. They described one of the missing pieces as a necklace with 190 diamonds on two strands and one large diamond as a pendant, valued at $100,000 in all. The Countess said the jewels were only partly insured.

Countess Teruzzi was born Lily Weinman. Her parents, Jewish immigrants on Manhattan's West Side, brought her up to be an opera singer, and an opera singer she became. Caruso encouraged her and, as Lilian Lornia, she made her debut in Vienna in 1922. While singing at La Scala in 1926, Lilian met and married Mussolini's handsome Undersecretary of State (Mussolini was the best man).

She took her $100,000 in wedding presents, gave up the stage and, now as Sua Excellenza Donna Lilliana Teruzzi, wife of the General, went with her husband to

Goldstein, N.Y. Times Man, Makes An Irish Dream Come True

Damper than the breezes of Ballaghaderreen, the wind on 42d Street seeped into Canon James Hunt's old-fashioned suit and tugged at his thin, gray hair. The air — or perhaps a touch of happiness — brought a flush to the fine Irish landscape of his face.

"When I finish this, my life's work is over," said the canon, dodging the weekend traffic on Eighth Avenue, in New York, where he arrived from Ballaghaderreen, County Roscommon, in partial fulfillment of a dream, says Eric Pace, in the New York Times.

For fourteen years the canon (whose Roman Catholic Church title ranks close to monsignor) has been obliged to have mass celebrated in a cold, stone schoolhouse at Orlar, a poor area of his 11-by-5-mile country parish.

A priest for 40 of his 65 years, Canon Hunt prayed for funds to build Orlar a church. Elsewhere in his parish the faithful have two churches, but the families of Orlar are too poor to build one of their own.

Now the canon's prayers can be fulfilled before too long, largely through the work of Nathan W. Goldstein, circulation director of The New York Times, and his friends.

"Ah, sure, they're the loveliest crowd you could possibly meet," says the canon, whose visit to New York is part of what Mr. Goldstein calls "a beautiful Irish fairy tale."

The tale began last year, when Sister Mary of the Blessed Trinity, a cloistered nun at the Monastery of St. Dominic in Newark, New Jersey, wrote to The Times, asking help for Orlar. She had lived in the parish as a girl.

Not long afterward, two Times circulation men, Joe Di-Donato and Joseph Del Negro, called on the sister, now in her seventies, to discuss her appeal.

"Sister Mary admitted to us that she felt apprehensive" at the meeting, Mr. Del Negro later reported. It was her first contact with the outside world in about 50 years.

Soon afterward, a testimonial dinner was held for Mr. Goldstein. From the left-over funds, he asked that $500 be set aside for his synagogue and $500 toward a church for Orlar.

Sister Mary wrote to Pat Reynolds, The Times' circulation manager, a letter of thanks.

"The most we could do was shed big tears of gratitude," she wrote on a schoolgirl's lined pad. "Mr. Goldstein is a Jew, but after all, are we not all descendants of the 'chosen people'? Our dear Lord and Blessed Mother were Jews . . . We often say our dear Lord must have implanted thrift and charity deep in the heart of the Jewish people;

Engineer Was Collaborator On First Atomic Bomb

Zola G. Deutsch, the chemical and mechanical consulting engineer who late in 1941 did the first survey work for the site of the Manhattan Project for the manufacture of the atomic bomb, died in his home on Drakestown Road, Hackettstown, New Jersey. He was 65 years old.

Mr. Deutsch, a specialist in alkali plant engineering, was called in by the U.S. Office of Scientific Research and Development in January, 1942, to serve as divisional engineer on problems connected with the separation of uranium isotopes, says the New York Times. He served the government in Tennessee until June, 1945. It was during this time that he worked for the Manhattan Project.

Among various inventions credited to Mr. Deutsch were improvements in multiple effect evaporation, gas concentrators of stills, and the interchange of steam and electric power.

He wrote reports on the alkali, chlorine, and heavy chemical plants in Germany after War II, and contributed an article, entitled "Alkali and Chlorine," to the Encyclopedia of Chemical Technology, and an article on sodium carbonates and bicarbonates to Thorpe's Dictionary of Applied Science.

After receiving a chemical engineering degree at the University of Cincinnati in 1923, Mr. Deutsch became a chemist for the West India Sugar Finance Corporation in Cuba. Subsequently he worked as a marine engineer for several steamship lines and then went into the design of alkali works. He was plant engineer of the Lake Charles, Louisiana, and Saltville, Virginia, plants of the Mathieson Alkali Works from 1930 to 1938.

End of German R...tion Funds Confronts Jewish World With Major Gap

American Jewish leaders were told that the loss of $17 million in annual German reparation payments had created a "major gap in the global budget" to meet Jewish needs throughout the world, with special emphasis on Israel.

Jacob Blaustein, Baltimore, Maryland, industrialist and senior vice president of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, said the strongest impact of this loss would be felt by the Joint Distribution Committee, says the New York Times, and the Jewish Agency for Israel, the beneficiaries of the United Jewish Appeal.

These agencies carry out migration, reconstruction, rehabilitation, and resettlement programs among needy Jewish men, women and children.

Mr. Blaustein, honorary president of the American Jewish Committee, was unable to deliver his report because of the death of his mother, Mrs. Henrietta Blaustein, in Baltimore two days before. His report, the highlight of the opening of the United Jewish Appeal's 28th annual national conference at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, was delivered by Rabbi Herbert A. Friedman, executive vice chairman of the Appeal.

The termination of German reparation funds, which occurred early last year by prior agreement, the report said, "confronts the Jewish world with major difficulties of great magnitude."

Mr. Blaustein cited the total loss to Jewish agencies and to Israel, which carries the greatest burden of Jewish immigrant absorption, at $77 million, as follows:

The Joint Distribution Committee no longer receives some $7 million in annual allocations, which represents about 25 per cent of its yearly budget.

The Joint, as it is familiarly known, conducts welfare, medical, and rehabilitation programs aiding more than 400,000 indigent Jews in North Africa, Europe, and the Middle East. It operates also special care programs for more than 50,000 aged and handicapped among Israel's immigrants.

The Jewish Agency for Israel, whose major finances also come from the Appeal, has lost about $10 million in annual payments formerly allocated from reparations the Israel Government received from West Germany, says the New York Times. The agency is responsible for the transfer, resettlement, and absorption of Jewish immigrants in Israel.

The Israeli Government no longer receives $60 million in annual goods and services as material reparations from Germany, which formerly made a major contribution to Israel's economic development.

At the same session, Senator Jacob K. Javits called for a "firm and direct control" over the shipment of food to the United Arab Republic.

The New York Republican noted that the United States had provided $431 million in aid to the United Arab Republic in a three-year agreement that ended in June. Late last fall, he said, the Government announced a new six-month agreement to provide $55 million in wheat and other foodstuffs.

Americans, Senator Javits said, "do not wish to see Egyptians or any other people go hungry." He said some questions must be raised "as to whether our aid will have the ultimate effect of bolstering

This fall Mr. Goldstein wrote letters to the thousands of people on his holiday card list, asking them to chip in a little "to bring real happiness to an old nun, an old priest and a devoted parish."

Contributions to what one donor called Mr. Goldstein's "non-Zionist crusade" poured in from places as far away as Yokohama, Japan, and Singapore until more than $10,000 had been raised.

Canon Hunt flew over to meet and thank Sister Mary, Mr. Goldstein, and Orlar's other benefactors, says the New York Times. So now the canon is a temporary New Yorker, treading the sidewalks as surely as if they were the good solid sod of County Roscommon.

A BREATH OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY ON A LOTUS FRUIT ISLAND

"On my first visit to Djerba, I found the Jewish children there the most deprived in Tunisia," Katya Roberts wrote recently. She is the Joint Distribution Committee day-care consultant for Tunisia. "Establishment of a kindergarten meant for them not only a breath of the twentieth century and the introduction of basic elements of hygiene and education, but also victory over the superstitions and stubbornness of their parents."

Djerba is an island, twenty miles long, in the Gulf of Gabes, off the southern coast of Tunisia. Its population is 35,000. Twenty-five centuries ago, when King Nebuchadnezzar's warriors destroyed the Temple of Judah, some of the Israelites fled to the west. After many years of wandering, they finally settled in Northern Africa. It is thought that a few thousand of them settled on the tiny island of Djerba, which is believed to be the spot where Ulysses and his sailors stopped and "ate of the lotus fruit and forgot their families and homes."

For 2,500 years the Djerban Jews lived in complete isolation. Their lives were much closer to that of the ancients than to contemporary civilization. When JDC started its program there 13 years ago, the Jews of the island still remembered and worshipped the memory of their old home. They were still in deep mourning for the Temple; men wore little black ribbons on the bottoms of their trousers, incidentally, the only thing differentiating them from the Moslems, as a symbol of their grief; music and song were forbidden on the Jewish part of the island. The ancient disaster played a predominant role in Jewish life and thinking.

When the miraculous news of creation of the State of Israel reached the island, some of the Djerban Jews decided to return to their ancient homeland. Since 1948 the Jewish population of the island has decreased from 4,500 to approximately 1,600. Most of the residents are artisans, goldsmiths, silversmiths, tailors, shoemakers, or carpenters. Their language is Arabic. Only in recent years the boys have begun to attend Government schools. Previously their whole education was limited to religious training.

When JDC first initiated its programs in 1952, it found poverty and destitution, suffering and primitivity throughout the island. JDC established a school, a clinic, canteens for school-aged children, and modernized two kindergartens. In addition, the JDC program included distribution of clothing and food packages. One year ago seven young girls, residents of Djerba, finished a JDC-sponsored course in day-care for pre-school children, the first ever undertaken on the island.

More than 100 children (aged three to five) now attend two kindergartens equipped with toilets, showers, and other modern facilities, and participate in an over-all program which includes Hebrew lessons, painting (for the first time in the history of the island, children paint) and the basic elements of modern Jewish and secular education. The two kindergartens, run by OSE and the Tunisian Jewish Health and Child Care Organization (and financed and supervised by JDC with funds provided by the United Jewish Appeal), continue their programs and, amazingly, are accepted by even the most Orthodox Jews.

"I find the children of Djerba extremely bright, active, and creative. It is only a pity that we did not start our program some years ago because we would already have had an entire generation brought up in the modern education systems," Miss Roberts said. "But even now I keep thinking about the seventy kids whom we could not admit to our nursery school due to lack of space. And the lack of funds for expansion."

let, both within the Jewish community and in the country as a whole, by espousing the cause of the Negro.

"In the first place no white spokesmen of any kind can be more than allies to the Negro in this battle. The day is gone when that community will allow anyone who is not a Negro to be a major spokesman for him. It is today inconceivable that any white man can head a major civil rights organization, as Spingarn did for an entire generation as the founder of the NAACP.

"In the second place, the rabbinate is far from having solved a certain 'Jewish aspect' of the race struggle. The essence of the problem is that the rabbis themselves share in at least some of the ambivalence about the Negro that abounds among the laity.

"Like their congregants, the rabbis are worried about intermarriage. They, too, have the feeling that a totally open Jewish community, that is primarily involved in larger social issues, is one that might vanish as a separate entity. The most liberal Christian ministers are comforted by the knowledge that the Negro is a Christian. Such men are willing to accept, and some even to urge, inter-racial marriages because they regard such an attitude as the highest expression of contemporary Christian faith.

"It is true, indeed, that the Christian inter-racial couple of today does not need to be lost to the Church. The synagogue is just beginning to face the problem of the Jewish-Christian inter-racial couple. It has certainly not yet arrived at the point of welcoming the phenomenon.

"The rabbis know that their presence in the Civil Rights movement is making them encounter many Jews, especially of the younger generation, who are entirely committed to this struggle. What makes the rabbis uneasy, and what, therefore, makes it impossible for them to find their fulfillment in civil rights, is the feeling that they are not thereby bringing peripheral Jews back to any of the parochial Jewish concerns.

"On the contrary, a rabbinic effort to identify contemporary Judaism primarily with the struggle for justice may well serve to confirm a notion that few rabbis could possibly want to strengthen: that all that is 'in-group' within Jewry is irrelevant and dead.

"The religious situation of the American rabbi is the most difficult that it has been in modern times. Almost the whole organized enterprise of Jewish life in America is today running less on passion and conviction than on momentum and on emotions about togetherness. What the rabbis are doing at this moment amounts to a holding operation. They are using every technique they can muster to relate individual Jews to some function or service provided by the Jewish community. This is why the rabbis are so busy."

RABBI SAYS THAT RABBIS ARE ON THE WAY OUT

A leading American rabbi, Dr. Arthur Hertzberg, of Temple Emanu-El, of Englewood, New Jersey, believes that the American rabbi, as we know him today, is on the way out, that his religious function is "becoming ever more vestigial." He says that like the priests in ancient Israel, who were succeeded by the rabbinate, today's rabbis will be replaced as were the earlier priesthood.

The well known author, a member of the faculty at Columbia University, believes that the rabbi, like his Christian brethren, is steadily losing influence and becoming less and less of a factor in the life of the American community.

Rabbi Hertzberg's views are expressed in the January issue of "Midstream," a Jewish journal of opinion which, with its January issue, has become a monthly. Heretofore, it was published quarterly by an editorial board of the Herzl Foundation under the chairmanship of Dr. Emanuel Neumann.

In answer to his own question, "Can the rabbinate survive in its present form and with its present functions?" Rabbi Hertzberg says:

"I think not! The rabbinate that Jews have known for two millennia ended in America within the last decade. This hardly noticed event is as historic a turning as the beginnings of the rabbinate in ancient Israel, when the priest of the Temple lost the leadership of Judaism to the nascent class of Pharisaic teachers.

"The rabbinate arose then as a new leadership, which the Jews were willing to accept, because the rabbis were the arbiters of a system of religious values which commanded their assent. While the early Pharisees were rising to dominance during the last years of the Second Temple, the priesthood remained, and it continued to perform ritual functions but these activities became ever more vestigial."

Rabbi Hertzberg described the rabbi of today as higher salaried and less powerful than his predecessor of a generation ago. He is "no longer the only learned man in his congregation" and is less scholarly than his predecessor. He is less a religious leader and more an administrator and a pastoral psychiatrist. As the institutional executive" of a large organization, the rabbi of today, says Rabbi Hertzberg, is less a personality and more a bureaucrat. He is less a crusader and is much more "safe." Because "Jews will not come to synagogues in great numbers to pray," the rabbi has become a book reviewer, an entertainer, a commentator on cultural and political life.

"All of these," said Rabbi Hertzberg, "are now much of the business of Jewish life, not because the rabbis really care about any of them, and not, as some of their critics have been maintaining, because the American rabbis have become vulgar. The rabbinate today is, essentially, neither judge nor leader. It is the agent of a remaining powerful and pervasive emotion about Jewish togetherness. The purely religious function of the rabbi has been becoming ever more vestigial for decades.

"Indeed, it is as far now from the center of Jewish mass consciousness as were the ritual functions of the priesthood of old. The rabbi's more contemporary role as leader of the Jews in a hostile world, or as moral guide to their political action, is constantly diminishing. He has become peripheral to the major social struggles of this age.

"The rabbinate thrived for many centuries by offering Jews a vision of themselves as the servants of God. It then carried on, for a relatively short time, by holding up the dream of the Jew as servants of their own quest for freedom and, therefore, as trailblazers for all the oppressed. The Jewish community within which the rabbis are working today sees itself, for the most part, as the servant of its own survival. There are no great, individual rabbinic careers, because there are no shared Jewish purposes on the American scene grand enough to evoke them.

"And I see no sign of such purposes on the horizon."

The present crisis in the hearts and souls of American rabbis, Rabbi Hertzberg contends, is caused by the bigness and the success of the synagogue, the de-personalization of the individual rabbi, and the strengthening of the central rabbinical bodies of the various Jewish religious denominations. Rabbi Hertzberg believes that there are no truly great national rabbis today. "men like Solomon Goldman, in Chicago; Abba Hillel Silver, in Cleveland; and Israel Goldstein, and Stephen Wise in New York."

These men, he said, were bigger than their individual "synagogues; they exercised "what was essentially political leadership in the Jewish community and on its behalf in American politics and in international Jewish affairs. They played a major role in the development of Zionist sentiment in the United States, and in paving the way for the establishment of the State of Israel, and its recognition by the U.S."

Rabbi Hertzberg compared the role of these great rabbis in the leadership of American Jewry of thirty and forty years ago with that exercised by Martin Luther King as a "Negro political leader of today. Rabbis Wise, Silver, Goldman, and the others," said Rabbi Hertzberg, "represented a comparable phenomenon, at a comparable stage in the development of the American Jewish community.

"The American rabbi of today is quite clearly a different phenomenon. There exist today many individual congregations as large as or larger than the congregations headed by Wise and Silver. Nonetheless, no comparably renowned rabbinic names have emerged. There is hardly one rabbinic figure today who commands the attention of the entire Jewish community. The organized enterprise that the rabbis head, the synagogue and all its institutions, is more powerful than ever before, but the rabbis seem to be less so.

"The status within the general community, and sometimes even within an individual congregation, is much more affected today by the relation of the rabbi to his denominational superiors than it was a generation ago. The result is that rabbinic careers today are evermore being made in semi-bureaucratic fashion. They tend to be safe, rather than picturesque."

Rabbi Hertzberg contends that social change in the American Jewish community has made it necessary for the rabbi to become less and less a religious leader.

"The essence of the problem that confronts the American rabbi today, much more sharply than it was ever faced by his predecessors," Rabbi Hertzberg says, "is the question of faith and purpose. To what end can the rabbi really lead?

"The crisis of Jewish faith is a long standing one. It is at least two centuries old. In its starkest form, it boils down to the question: if one rejects Orthodoxy, why be a Jew at all? This is the Jewish version of a question that has been confronting all of religion in the age of modernity; what is the role of faith among men whose primary concerns are of this world?

"The dominant answer among all the faiths has been that the contemporary function of religion is to play some significant role in the remaking of society. In the 19th century, and in the first part of the 20th, western Christianity addressed itself, in the name of the 'social gospel,' to the woes of the underprivileged. In America today the most advanced churchmen make it their prime business to be on the barricades in the battle for racial equality.

"In Jewish circles the equivalent of this 'social gospel' has been the continuing battle of the Jews to reorder their own situation in the world. During the last century the rabbinate has been in the forefront of the fight for Jewish equality. In America, this battle is now over.

"The Jewish community itself has few tangible problems. It would be content to stop the social clock at this moment, so far as its own interests are concerned. The rabbinate, therefore, has no local Jewish social tasks left. The remaining issues concern the relationship of American Jews to other communities, especially to the Jews of Israel and to the Negroes in America. Both of these cares involve basic issues and Jewish commitments, and rabbis are inevitably in the middle of the several battles.

"Nonetheless, it scarcely needs demonstrating that the American rabbinate is very much less involved in Zionism today than it was two decades ago. It is equally clear, despite the presence of rabbis in places like Selma, that race relations are not today the major cause preoccupying the American rabbinate.

"There is nothing in the tenor of rabbinic involvement in the Civil Rights issue which resembles the urgency and singleness of purpose with which many of these same men picketed Great Britain twenty years ago, when they were still students at the seminaries. In their heart of hearts the majority of American rabbis are ambivalent, for very serious reasons, about all the immediate, tangible issues of this day.

"Today the most obvious place is in the arena of social action on the American scene, which means the problem of race. But here, too, the rabbis are in some tension. All of the leadership elements of the Jewish community have been drawn into this issue. A sense of moral compulsion is operating, allied with the feeling that no civic or religious leadership of any persuasion can avoid the question of the Negro without being reduced to irrelevance.

"The rabbinate has certainly been serving the Negro cause no less than any comparable group of liberal clergy in any of the denominations, and the organized Jewish community has been involved in the race struggle more, perhaps, than any other white group. Nonetheless, it is hardly likely that the American rabbis in their various pulpits will find an adequate out-
